Mentorship Relationship Building

Since mentoring may involve both people you know and perfect strangers, the most successful relationships happen when partners have thought through their definition of mentoring, and their own preferences and parameters for their relationships before embarking on such relationships.

A Guide to Being a Mentor

"Listen actively both to what is being said and how it is being said. Ask open, supportive questions and provide constructive feedback. Help the mentoring partner solve his or her own problem, rather than giving direction. Focus on the mentoring partner's development, and resist the urge to produce a clone."

A Guide to Being a Mentee

"Be proactive. Whether your mentor is assigned to you, or you have chosen one yourself, make the first appointment to talk about your career. Have a game plan for your conversations with your mentor."
